

Other People's Ideas

Published July 8th, 2014

Calvin Staples, MSc

Dizziness, a topic I am definitely not an expert in. This issue of Canadian Audiologist has a focus on dizziness. At one time, I spent the better part of my day working with the dizzy patient, but like many audiologists in Canada, I drifted into hearing aids. Dizziness is a part of audiology, albeit often overlooked and could possibly represent an underserved part of the population. Alan Desmond states in his blog "ENG/VNG: Useful?" the use of the advanced ENG/VNG testing techniques are critical in properly evaluating the dizzy patient. The audiology field would probably benefit from more clinicians providing assessment and treatment options to patients who report dizziness. The increase in services would deepen the scope of practice to the general public.

In this issue of Canadian Audiologist, I have included two of Alan Desmond's blogs titled "What do you mean when you say dizzy?" There are eight blogs with the title "What do you mean when you say dizzy" and each has some form of quick clinical utility with the ability to expand your search and depth quite quickly. Alan's blogs are a wonderful 'jumping off point', to get you back into helping our dizzy patients.